Teaching profile: contemporary theologies of islam in the digital age

The Department of Theology at the University of Lorraine is recruiting a Junior Professor in the field of contemporary theologies of Islam with an excellent record of scientific research, teaching and societal impact.

Since 2018, the Department of Theology at the University of Lorraine has been reorienting itself in the direction of a plural theology in which the theology of Islam has its rightful place. This reorientation is part of the UFR SHS Metz's commitment to the issues of radicalization and violence. It corresponds to an essential questioning of the place of religion in democratic societies. It is in this context and this new dynamic that the candidate will have to develop and co-lead within the department the field of contemporary theology of Islam, in connection with new technologies, in particular digital humanities.

The candidate must be able to teach at Licence and Master level, in the DU "Religions-laïcité-inclusion sociale", and may also, on request, intervene on an ad hoc basis in the Prefecture Zone de Défense (CAPRAVI - radicalization prevention program).

Non-French-speaking applicants are welcome and encouraged, but to qualify for tenure the candidate must be able to give all courses in French by the end of the first year.

He/she will

- master one or more theological currents of classical and contemporary Islam in their original languages;
- have particular competence in the historical, social and/or philosophical approach to Islamic currents, as well as knowledge of contemporary theological issues in the context of intercultural societies;
- demonstrate significant teaching experience, an innovative vision of pedagogy and distance learning, and mastery of associated IT tools;
- help raise the department's profile both nationally and internationally;
- will eventually take on administrative responsibilities within the department.

Mastery of IT tools related to digital humanities is an asset.

Research profile: Contemporary theologies of islam

The person recruited will aim to develop knowledge of contemporary Islamic theologies within the framework of a plural approach that will enable the angles of analysis and fundamental concepts to be renewed within the current scientific debate.

The laboratory is looking to recruit a researcher of high scientific standing in contemporary Islamic theologies, demonstrating dynamism in terms of international influence, peer-reviewed publications in the field of Islamic studies, Islamic theology, or related languages and disciplines. He/she will participate in the team's multidisciplinary and interdisciplinary research activities.

He/she will

- master one or more theological currents of classical and contemporary Islam in their original languages;
- have the historical and theological skills needed to study the links between theological discourses and the political powers of the countries in which they originated, in order to assess their possible propaganda impact, and to measure the relationship between these "official" discourses and others with which they are interwoven or, on the contrary, which they contradict (notably complotism).

He/she will demonstrate

- an ability and willingness to create and strengthen interdisciplinary collaborations with colleagues from other disciplines in the humanities and social sciences;
- a relevant national and international network, as demonstrated, for example, by participation in national and international conferences and research projects;
- a willingness to disseminate its research and teaching to a wide audience, and to link its field of expertise with contemporary societal and cultural issues;

Within the Laboratory, the candidate will be able to publish in a foreign language, and will demonstrate compatibility with the central research themes of Écritures, namely an interdisciplinary dialogue between literature, theology, the arts and philosophy.

He/she will be encouraged to strengthen his/her national and international network, and will set up (or participate in) national research projects, whether with institutional partners such as the Ministry of the Interior (Bureau central des cultes) or the Prefecture, but also ANR and European projects (ERC, Marie Skłodowska-Curie, etc.).

Laboratory name: Center of research Ecritures (UR 3943)

Keywords: islams, theology and society, religions and democracy, theology and radicalization, discourse and counter-discourse,
